A DICKENS CELEBRATION

Charles Dickens was a shrewd manager of his own public image and would be pleased that his birthday - February 7 1812 - is early enough to start the bicentennial ball rolling, well ahead of the Queen's Golden Jubilee and the 2012 Olympic Games. There will be many celebrations of the man and his work during 2012.

Dickens certainly knew the ancient churches of London; the Friends of the City Churches might only wish that he had loved them just a little better. His friend Anthony Trollope (1815-82) wrote perceptively of churchmen and their families in the imagined cathedral city of Barchester, and also anatomized London society, though he never united those themes in a single great work. Had Dickens only taken a comparable interest in the London clergy, the City churches might be replete with thinly-veiled references that could now be quoted with pride. In the event, Dickens was rather more engaged by the law than the church.

Dickens' references to City churches are fleeting – young David Copperfield watches “the giants of St. Dunstan's strike upon the bells” as its famous clock strikes twelve, views of the tower of St. Saviour's (now Southwark Cathedral) and the spire of St. Magnus set up Nancy's covert meeting with Mr. Brownlow and Rose Maylie in Oliver Twist, and St. Paul's dome and churchyard neatly locate various scenes in the novels and sketches. Some just skirt the City – the ‘Bloomsbury christening’ in Sketches by Boz is set in the Hawksmoor church just south of the British Museum, while St. George the Martyr, hard by the Marshalsea debtors' prison, is the site of Little Dorrit's christening and wedding. Dickens knew the Marshalsea only too well, his own father having been confined there, and by choice and circumstance lived in and around Bloomsbury for many years.

But his experience of the City also illustrates the great shift in population that had such critical consequences for its churches. As a very young man, he haunted Lombard Street for some four years in thrall to Maria Beadnell, pretty and frivolous, who rejected him but lived on in memory as a model for David Copperfield's beloved but undeniably dizzy starter wife, Dora. Maria's father was a banker, and the family, not unusually even in the 1830s, lived next to the shop. Poignantly, both the bank and the house were demolished in 1836, the very year in which Dickens married another; a restaurant now occupies the site, 1 Lombard Street, with the cornerstone of the erstwhile Smith, Payne & Smiths Bank just inside its doors.

By 1859, when Dickens launched the weekly journal All the Year Round, bankers and clerks were decamping to the suburbs, thanks to new-fangled omnibuses and trains, and the residential population of the City was plummeting. Dickens himself realised a childhood dream with the purchase of Gads Hill Place in Kent, but kept a pied-a-terre above his office in Wellington Street, Covent Garden. Clearly, he often spent weekends in town, for he then embarked on a year of Sunday visits to City churches, recorded in The Uncommercial Traveller of 1860 (with expanded editions until 1869, the year before his death). Even here, few churches are named although many are described – all as decaying monuments of another age, where scant congregations “wink, sneeze, and cough” under “a strong kind of invisible snuff ... made of the decay of matting, wood, cloth, stone, iron, earth, and ... the decay of dead citizens in the vaults below”. Today, with the clearance of the City's vaults and burial grounds, even the dead citizens now lie in suburban cemeteries – but many of their churches are thriving once again, with weekday services for City workers, and a rich mix of denominations on Sundays. It would be a fitting commemoration of the Dickens bicentenary to visit them all in 2012, starting with those where Friends of the City Churches volunteers will gladly help uncommercial travellers to find their way.
